The learner is, from first to last, exercised in actually speaking the language, as well as in writing it and committing to memory its words. He is not given the theory of the language merely. Everything taught he is enabled to use readily and correctly in conversation; and this from the necessary result of the method pursued. The tongue and the ear are given their full share of exercise, so that nothing is imparted to the understanding which is not entirely available in its practical use. Possessed of these characteristics, we give the method our entire commendation. Its adaptation to the wants of the learner is too obvious to need much comment, did our limits admit; and those who become acquainted with its practical workings will be still more sensible of its value. Men have been accustomed to make themselves acquainted with the living as well as the dead languages through the eye only, and have then wondered that they did not understand them through the ear, and could not communicate them readily by the tongue; not considering that the signs of ideas which are marked by letters on paper, and make their impression on the sight, can have no possible resemblance to the sounds which we hear, or the articulations which we enunciate. A living language, to be learned as it should be, must be made familiar to the sight, the hearing, and the organs of...
